

Ebola and Enterovirus 68 – Porous Borders and Immigration (Global Warming it is not)

Here we are, a nation of about 320 million people, each of us going about our daily lives. Some of us believe the threat of collapse is all around us, others of us are too busy with whatever it is we are doing to pay attention, and the remainder, perhaps a majority of us, are simply grabbing whatever it is the Government is handing to us. The circumstances around us are as chaotic as I feel in attempting to write this. Yet they are not.

Ebola has come to our borders and crossed into our nation. What is presently happening in Texas can easily happen elsewhere in this nation by spreading across internal borders from State to State. Perhaps you think that in saying that I am an alarmist of unnecessary fear and pessimism. Perhaps you think it is doomsdays prophesy of something like that in a Grade C, End-of-the-World movie. Perhaps you should think.

On Thursday of this past week a doctor was asked to what stage of development of the Ebola infection must a victim become in order to transmit the virus to others? His answer was vague, somewhere between “onset of infection” and “full-blown symptoms.” It was as if he was reluctant to say in fear of causing panic across the entire nation and yet more reluctant to be dismissive. Unfortunately for us it is not just that doctor but also our government that seems to be dismissive, and not just on Ebola but also ISIS, debt, lack of jobs, etc.

Our borders, not just those on the north and south, are porous. We have just discovered that someone who actively carries Ebola can commercially fly into the United States from a nation in which Ebola is rampant and is free to walk the streets, shake hands, and cough into the faces of others. (I am not knowledgeable and certainly not an expert on this but I believe it is entirely foolish to assume the “experts” are correct in saying Ebola can not spread though the air. We need not panic but we also need not unnecessarily put ourselves in harms way.)

And while all of this taking place and on the very day that the details of how easily an Ebola-infected individual got into our nation, Obama attends a D. C. dinner with immigration activists and tells them "no force on earth can stop us ... the clearest path to change is to change [the voter turnout] number," click HERE. And meanwhile, while all of this is taking place and on the very day all of this occurs we learn that the ISIS may intend to use Ebola as a terrorist weapon, click HERE, and HERE.

And as we read the news that Ebola is now in the U. S., we are learning that Enterovirus 68 virus, or a more potent derivative, is affecting U. S. children - click HERE. The “experts” tell us they have no idea why this virus has “suddenly” appeared in so many places. Do they not know or is it that they will not say?

Are you like me and suspect that it all gets down to “porous borders?” One thing is for certain – in spite of the claims by Al Gore’s Kool-Aid Kids, click HERE, this has nothing to do with Global Warming.
